Values and Ideals:

Many relationships that have been established, exist as is. They are not necessarily formalized by agreement, entity, opportunity and profit sharing, or even in the basic interest and concern for the wellbeing and success of the entrepreneur or enterprise. Many times customers just acquire who they can get, sometimes only based on price, drive hard bargains, ruin relationships, or simply not build and maintain them for the long term. This is too bad, as many times, in a construction trade, a really competent and skilled person, may be very sincere in their relations and take great pride in their work. This is an asset to have around and not be abused! Resources and capacity to better manage and get things done can be improved over time. New entrepreneurial contractors often have lots of energy, enthusiasm, desire and intention, with long term career plans. Capitalizing on strengths, assets, competence and useful combinations can go a long way to develop mutually beneficial relationships and success, while reducing stress, inadequacies or other less than ideal situations. If we work at this, we are confident that we can build great things together!

In some cultures, a network of trust and mutual co-operation exists, like the three musketeers, all for one, one for all. So, if you are part of a group, joint venture, association, business combination or unit, this is more possible. Everyone still gets to run their own show, but it is possible to contribute to a bigger entity that looks after its own and values the success of the people. This also enables risk and liability management, optimized asset and resource deployment and interesting potential to explore and discover! These ideals can help secure and provide those good solid high paying jobs. So, we need to have our stuff together, right?
